one line of code in the malicious dll called initcheck and two functions initdetect and initcache were added. the malicious code initiates a communication channel with the victim's network and starts to obtain the command and control (c&c) server's information. subsequently, a dll file is downloaded from the c&c server and called by the malicious code. the malicious code then obtains a copy of the dll file from the c&c server, calls the dll file with the malicious code, and passes the information to the dll. as the attack unfolds, we will continue to provide new information based on our investigations, working with industry and the security community to share insights into how to protect against this and other advanced threats. based on the detection of the compromised dll and the detection of abnormal activity and a customer's reported use of the solarwinds orion platform, microsoft is working with solarwinds to assist with troubleshooting the issue on affected systems. based on the detection of the compromised dll and the detection of abnormal activity and a customer's reported use of the solarwinds orion platform, microsoft is working with solarwinds to assist with troubleshooting the issue on affected systems. learn more about microsoft's attack detection the end goal of the solarwinds orion platform is to provide a unified solution across all aspects of it management, allowing customers to manage all of their network infrastructure devices, servers and applications through a single interface. since a lot of the customers use this solution in conjunction with other applications, the platform acts as a management hub to consolidate the data obtained from these systems and applications.
